Abstrak

In Indonesia, the privatization of some state owned firms have met strong external and internal stakeholders' resistance causing delay or even failure in spite-of-the fact that privatization has swept the world. Starting in the UK in the early 1980s, privatization has spread to other developed and developing countries. This essay attempts to investigate the process of privatization in Indonesia when compared with the experience of other countries vis a vis country specific characteristics and strategies related to the privatization transactions as well as the acquiring parties' strategy. With regard to these variables, differences are noted between the practices in the former eastern block countries, developed and developing countries inclusive of in Indonesia.
