Abstrak

It is a paradox that Indonesian agriculture would prefer a market oriented condition to enhance its economic performance but at the same time it requires a significant degree of Government intervention to maintain its economic and non economic goals to face with economic globalization. The existence of market imperfection as an argument of government intervention on agriculture has been an economic characteristic of agriculture of developing countries and it is being worsened by biased trade policy applied by developed countries. By realizing its unfaded importance, Indonesia should see the paradox and consider it when making position for negotiations on market liberalization of agriculture.
