Abstrak

Local wisdom was believed as a significant potency for some ethnics in Indonesia to sustain living in the coastal areas. Bugis and Bajo people were known as two ethnics among others who get used to live in the coastal areas, sailing across the ocean, and lived outside their traditional habitats. On the other hand some coastal development policies, new introduced coastal activities, or natural hazards tend to change the environmental conditions of their settlement. These could disturb the existence of their settlements in the coastal areas. Based on, private research on coastal settlement since 2002, this paper described the role of tradition, adaptation, or transformation strategy of Bugis and Bajo community to survive living in Jakarta, East Nusa Tenggara and West Nusa Tenggara islands and coastal settlements. Unsupported by information and awareness on new discoveries, improve interpretation on sustainable living, and relevant government interventions, local wisdom could support them to survive but not sufficient to improve the coastal community resilience on coastal disaster and ensure the sustainability of their settlements in the coastal areas.
