This undergraduate thesis discussed about malpractice by lawyers in Indonesia and Japan. The research was carried out in a normative comparative form with case study design. Its result revealed some similarities and differences between malpractice by lawyers in the two countries viewed from the perspective of law and regulation, ethical trial procedure and application of sanctions. Comparisons disclosed that each legal system has its own strength and weakness. Learning from the experience of Japan, the author put forward some suggestions in revising Indonesia's Attorney Act, in rearranging the lawyers' organization and participation of the society in abating malpractice by lawyers.
