Abstrak

Income tax could provide insights into the effectiveness of tax policy and the role of accounting. This paper examines the Indonesia income tax gap by focusing on accounts of taxpayers income statements frequently adjusted by tax auditors. The study also examines the reasons for these tax audit adjustments. This paper finds that the tax non-compliance can be traced into some accounts which are: 1) general and administrative costs; 2) COGS; and 3) sales. This study reveals that the main reason of the tax adjustments is due to the lack of evidence or supporting documents. The other reasons are inadequate tax knowledge of the taxpayers, the specific method of tax audit which leads to different tax payable amounts according to the auditors, the absence of arms length transactions, and no proper book keeping by the tax payer. In addition, this paper finds the relationship between the taxable income difference and two factors, i.e. company's turnover and type of industry (manufacture/non-manufacture). The results of this study bring implications for the tax policy improvement in Indonesia and the harmonisation between tax regulations and accounting standards; and these would be the main contribution of this study.
