Abstrak

The present work is the first installment of a long-rings project, born of the conviction that progress in Indo-European studies is contingent upon a thorough reconsideration of central morphology in the light of the theory laryngeal, without dissolving the whole into a Kurylowtczian hotbed of analogistic ferment. For this purpose the area of Sausure's initial progress serves as a starting point, followed by other questions that concern Indo-European morphology generally and cannot be localized in single dialects, including the noun and the pronoun.
