Abstrak

Drunk driving is a behavior that gives serious threat to the safety of road users. However, this danger of this behavior doesn't get enough attention from the society and law system in Jakarta. Hence, it is often conducted in the society, especially by college students. By using integrated theories of Social Bonding Theory, Containment Theory, Differential Association Theory, Differential Identification Theory, and Symbolic Interactionism, this research discuss about things that influence an individual's decision to commit drunk driving. This research was done by using mixed method that consists of quantitative and qualitative approaches. Quantitative approach was applied with self-reported survey, then followed with qualitative approach by using non-structured interview. The result shows that interaction with the family, friends, law enforcers, and self leads an individual to see drunk driving as an accepted behavior and not as a crime.
