Abstrak

Food security development can be used as one way to reduce poverty in Indonesia. This is because the conditions of poverty in Indonesia is dominantly available in rural areas. The characteristic of rural area in Indonesia is making the agricultural sector as main source of income for the communities. In order to accelerate poverty reduction through the food security development, it is necessary to shift paradigm of agricultural development to create a conducive climate of farming and to increase farmer's welfare. The shift of paradigm is important as foundation in creating synergies between stakeholders. Strengthening the food security aspects (production, distribution, and consumption) with concern to small-scale farming activities and the empowerment of the rural population are expected to improve the rural community's welfare.
