Abstrak

World maritime axis has been launched by President Joko Widodo, and its implementation is being overseen by the Indonesian parliament (DPR RI). Countries from inside and outside of the southeast Asia region show their own different responses, particularly connected with infrastructure development policy and law enforcement on the field. This essay is part of a comprehensive research report on the Indonesian new government's policy under Joko Widodo and the responses of other countries toward them, which discloses different reactions, arguments, reason and responses. The research was conducted in 2015 in provinces of Sumatera, Mollucas and Papua, whose data gathering is carried out by using library studies, focus group discussions, and in-depth interview with decision makers and experts on maritime sector development. Data analysis applied a qualitative method. Its findings reveal inconsistent responses of foreign countries in giving foreign investments for infrastructure development, and their critical views, and moreover, assertive towards law enforcement in the Indonesia water.
