Abstrak

I have devised a methodical research outline for students' final project that involve photography as their main medium. The method accomodates the two major kinds of photographic project characteristics. the first is the conceptual or the commercial type, and second is observational or the photo story type. This article focuses on a photo story type project by a student who has followed the method closely. Osel Gunarso focused his study on documenting a unique aculturation between Christian tradition and Balinese customs in the village of Blimbingsari in Jembrana Country, Bali. Thropugh ethnography and qualitative analysis, Gunarso archived visual discourse of understanding a cultural phenomenom. Although he had beautifully exhibited his documentary project, it also projected several problem and issues that would be important to consider in future project with similar conditions, especially undergraduate final projects that are confined to a single semester. Technical and non-technical issues in documentary photography become significant and therefore must be addressed in advance along with the methodology.
