Abstrak

This book provides a comprehensive overview of the field of housing for people with serious mental illness, with a special focus on citizenship and community life as key outcomes for people living with serious mental illness in community housing. It examines the history of this field while also pointing to the future to strengthen our theories, research, practice, and policy. The field of housing and mental health has been rapidly evolving over the past decade. This is the first comprehensive overview of this field. Despite impressive progress, the field is somewhat fractured and suffers from conceptual and definitional confusion. This book draws not only on the work of the editors, but also on the perspectives, experience, and expertise of a diverse set of international authors who are researchers, providers, and advocates of this housing. Thus, the book provides a summary of these critical developments, serves as a resource for researchers, practitioners, and policy makers looking for up-to-date reviews and perspectives on this field, as well as a sourcebook for current and future research and practice trends.
