ABSTRACT

This research aims to understand the relationship between extrinsic religious orientation and religious fundamentalism among Muslim students in Indonesia. For the purpose of this study, we focuses on the pathological fundamentalism as opposed to non pathological fundamentalism. Extrinsic religious orientation was developed based on the concept of Allport and Ross (196 7) with a contextual indicators for Muslim in Indonesia. Data was analyzed by Rasch model to gain a logit score for variables. The correlation between two variables is emerged by using each the logit scores. The result of analysis showed a positive correlation between extrinsic religious orientation and religious fundamentalism among Muslim students with  $R = 0,329$  ( $p < 0,01$ ).
