ABSTRACT

This study aims to investigate the characteristics of amanah (trustworthy) parents as well as the differences between amanah mothers and amanah fathers. Subjects were 444 high school students and college students in Pekanbaru, Riau with open ended questionnaire that we modified from Kim (2009). We analyzed the experimental data using a combination of qualitative and quantitative methods with indigenous psychology approach, which makes it possible to see phenomenon from the relevant context. Data were analyzed by categorizing the answers to the subject based on thematic similarities, then we conducted a cross tabulation which was based on the frequency response in the group category. The study found that there are four categories of characteristics for amanah mothers and fathers which are: (1) the role, (2) the character, (3) integrity, and (4) benevolence. The role is the ability of the parents to fulfill the mandate while the character is a collection of traits that leads to the behavior of the mandate of the elderly. The integrity is the compatibility and consistency between the commitment and behavior of parents in children. Finally, benevolence is a form of attention and affection of parents felt by children.
