The findings of this research showed that households with more than one credit were correlated with an increased likelihood of child psychological & physical domestic violence compared to the probability of not having child domestic violence, both before and after the control variables were included. Other variables such as spouse's age, head of household's higher education, spouse's higher education, number of household members, perception of domestic violence, children's school status, and child's age were statistically correlated with the outcomes of having Child Psychological Domestic Violence, having Child Physical Violence, and having both Child Psychological & Physical Domestic Violence.
