Abstrak

One critique, among others, delivered to the existing criminal justice system is that its decision rarely solves problem. There's always a case that the justice's decision whether to acquit or to punish the suspect be refused by related parties. At this point, a new idea of restorative justice, a model of justice which emphasizes healing for all related parties, is then introduced.

The writer proposes to combine the idea of restorative justice with another idea of diversion especially when the involved suspect is children.
