Abstrak

European integration process has come to the extent where interdependence between member has become more complex than a simple economic cooperation. At this point, European Union has reached a realm in which deeper political commitment is needed, not only between member states and the Union, but between individuals and the Union, The ever evolving jbrm of Union itself has become closer to a conventional nation-state. At this juncture, a European 'demos' - as a constituent base for European Union - is needed This poses a new issue for the Union: to build a common social identity in regional level.

This thesis tries to examine how does this process of social identity building of European can come to pass and made possible by European Union, using political psychology approaches available, to explore the nature ofthe process in individual, social, national, and regional level, and how European Union can actively promote, construct, and be made possible to be a main reference for Europeans? social identity. Furthermore, this thesis would propose the use of psychological approach in understanding social phenomenon in wider social scale, in this case, European integration.
