Abstrak

The relationship of political identities to human interest is complex but it is credible to think that political identities can play such decisive roles. A good example of this is the preception of threats, which is often a function of what others intend to do with their power. In turn these intentions may arise from domestic factors and more deeply seated strategies and cultures. Hence the effects of the relative difference between internal national identities on the way states behave toward one another in the external environment. In this essay I focus on the fact that in a globalized era and the post september 11th tragedy the Bush administration continues to deem important the assertion of American values in order to find security.
