This study aims to explore the informational role of nurses in managing elderly home care services in primary health care. This study is in the form of a qualitative study using a qualitative descriptive approach. Nine nurse participants as coordinators of the elderly program were involved in the implementation of this study and had experience managing elderly home care services at the primary health care between 1 to 9 years. The study produced six themes including; efforts to meet service needs; efforts to identify service outcomes; monitoring the implementation of home care services; dissemination of home care service management; coordination in program planning and governance; and coordination with stakeholders in service implementation efforts.
