The purpose of this research is to examine the influence of family supportive organizational perception on self efficacy demands and self efficacy challenges with work family conflict and perceived managerial support as mediators. This research is a quantitative research type with a conclusive research design. The sampling method is purposive sampling. A total of 307 female respondents from the technology and information industry in Jabodetabek were the samples for this research. In data processing, researchers used SPSS 25 and Lisrel 8.80 to carry out descriptive analysis and hypothesis testing using SEM. Research findings have reported that work family conflict successfully mediates the influence of family supportive organizational perception on self-efficacy demands and self-efficacy challenges. However, work family conflict and perceived managerial support cannot mediate the influence of family supportive organizational perception on self efficacy challenges. By using the results of this research analysis, practitioners can consider having a mechanism to facilitate procedures and bureaucratic personal leave requirements for employees. In addition, organizations can consider providing appropriate work schedules and benefits for employees if they are required to work outside the previously agreed schedule. Then, team leaders can provide regular one-on-one discussion sessions as a means of bonding for their members.
