Pirous' art from Abstract to Calligraphy in 1965-1970. An artist's journey to achieve his or her signature style is not instantaneous. The development of an artist's art style can be influenced by various factors such as the desire to find his identity. A.D Pirous, who at the beginning of his career was known as an Indonesian abstract artist, experienced a unique development where he was initially known as an Indonesian abstract artist to become one of the pioneers of modern calligraphy in Indonesia. The change was interestingly driven by his desire to find his national identity after realizing that his art education was heavily influenced by western art. Today, his calligraphic works are typical of Pirous's Indonesianness in the international art world. There have been many studies on Islamic values as well as studies outlining the technicalities of Pirous' works. Therefore, this study will illustrate A.D Pirous' national identity through the development of his art from 1965-1980. The development of his art shows that the changes in his style went through a long process. This research uses a historical writing method that includes topic selection, heuristics, verification (source criticism), interpretation, and historiography. Data supporting the research was obtained from the collection of painting archives, exhibition pamphlets, interviews, and books.
